----- Special Section on Next-generation Security Applications and Practice -----

The IEICE Transactions on Information and Systems announces that it will publish a special section entitled "Special Section on Next-generation Security Applications and Practice" in November 2021.

With the commercialization of 5G communication, the era of hyperconnectivity is coming while introducing new ICT platform evolution. As the data collected from autonomous vehicles and robots are transmitted to bigdata server in real time, it is expected to advance the practical use of artificial intelligence technology. In addition, the data collected from mobile devices such as smartphones and Internet tablets is increasing in speed and quantity compared to traditional personal computing era. As such, there has been an explosion of the Internet that has become increasingly dependent on intelligent and interconnected devices in all aspects of our lives lately. Examples are wearable devices such as smart systems, smart cars, smart clocks and digital glasses. In always-connected environments, i.e., new emerging ICT platform, mobile devices will still be essential gateways from a personal point of view, and bridging things can impact business intelligence and provide new possibilities for exchanging diverse data items. This can also pose a number of new potential risks to security and privacy, which must be considered.

Hence, the main motivation for this special issue is to bring together researchers, practitioners, policy makers, and hardware and software to explore the latest understanding and advances in the security and privacy for devices, applications, and systems. Especially, we focus on innovative information security applications and practice to respond quickly to new 5G era, Industry 4.0, Society 5.0, ICT platform evolution, and supply chains.

This special section will be associated with the upcoming World Conference on Information Security Applications (WISA 2020), which is one of the Korean flagship international security conferences. Besides, the special section will be not limited to the authors of WISA 2020, but will also be open to any author.
